Fund Manager's Report

Philippine sovereign bonds (ROPs) traded lower last August before paring down losses at the end of the month as the market began to weigh the possibilities of the Federal Reserve implementing further stimulus into the US economy. Bets on further stimulus measures dwindled, putting a halt in the US Treasury bond rally. ROPs traded down at this point, pushing the yields up on the long-end securities at the 4.0 percent level.

While US unemployment reported a higher 8.3 percent last August, the US economy saw some silver lining in their road to economic recovery as economic statistics started to pick-up: Non-farm payrolls decisively beat the median estimate, jobless claims started to decline, and the University of Michigan Consumer Confidence Indicator was better than expected. Despite the improving economic data, signs pointed back on further stimulus measures as minutes of the Federal Open Market Committee (FOMC) meeting revealed that many of its members advocated for the Federal Reserve to take action.
