Fund Manager's Report

After a strong rally in May and early June, US Treasury 10 year yields pulled back towards the 1H14 end from its year low of 2.45% to 2.60%. level The recent rally was due to a release of mixed economic data coming out of the US. This fueled further speculation that the US may continue to experience uneven growth recovery moving forward. Additionally, the Fed continued to signal that it may hold rates low for a considerable amount of time so as not to derail the on-going economic recovery. In Europe, the ECB led Europe into uncharted territory as it imposed a negative deposit rate. ECB deposit rate is now at negative 0.1% from zero; it also made measures to provide cheap long term loans to banks by cutting benchmark rates to 0.15% from 0.25%.

As a result, ROPs continue to move with US Treasuries. The ROP curve continued to bearish flatten as the market continues to view that short term interest rates will continue to normalize as central banks, specifically the FED, may wind down excessive monetary stimulus. On the Philippine funding side, there are reports that the Philippines may continue to buy back global bonds in 2015 and that the BTR may offer Sukuk and Dim Sum bonds in the next 2 years.
